The man loves his roses

THE ROSE MAN OF UPLAND

Some gentle kidding over the years about his love for roses hasn't stopped Don Jarvis of Upland.

The retired truck driver has loved the delicate-looking flowers since he was a youngster at his grandmother's knee in Colorado. Now the 72-year-old has built up a collection of 700 plants of America's favorite flora.

"Oh sure, I got kidded a little about my roses, but nothing too bad," Jarvis said with a grin. "I used to drive from the Atlantic to the Pacific and Canada to Mexico and in between; when I saw a rose I liked, I asked if I could get a piece or cutting of it to bring home."

Few refused the request and the Jarvis collection grew. The Jarvis backyard has been designated by the Heritage Rose book as an open garden. When all of the different varieties are in bloom in June, the family has frequent visitors at their home at 1404 Tulare Way.

The yard is filled with roses of every variety and color — miniatures, floribunda, hybrid teas, grandiflora and heritage.

Each flower is carefully labeled with its scientific and common name, such as Puppy's Love, Stars and Stripes, Pacesetter and Cupcake. The labels, however, really aren't needed since Jarvis can reel off each flower's name and history from memory.

"We've been here 21 years and when we moved from La Puente, we moved 450 rose bushes, too — and we only lost 10, Jarvis said. "We bought a lot of the roses at the market but we have some that just aren't bred anymore. We have some the dinosaurs didn't eat," he said.

Asking Jarvis which type of rose is his favorite is similar to asking a parent which child he prefers. Pinned down, however, he admits that heritage roses are special to him.

"They're the old-fashioned kind that were grown in the north where temperatures were 30 and 40 degrees below zero. Some of these other roses are just weak sisters," he said.

Despite their delicate appearance, roses are fairly hearty flowers. "If a rose wants to grow, you can't kill it and if it doesn't, there isn't anything on Earth you can do," he said.

The "old-timers," roses that were bred some time ago, are smart, Jarvis said, because they know when to go dormant.

Currently, Jarvis is getting ready to prune. Although some suggest cutting them back now, he said the area still could experience some cold weather. Pruning now could damage the bushes.

Instead, Jarvis said he plans to wait until the first of February. "I'm not a hard pruner. I cut them back to the main cane, take off extra wood and then cut back to the direction I want the branch to bend."

In addition to growing roses, Jarvis is a lifetime accredited rose judge. Judges look for roses that typify perfection — proper color and form.

Judges also look to see whether the petals are stiff and full and if the stem is equal to the size of the bloom, he said.

Roses are expensive to grow and buy, but they continue to be the most popular flower. Jarvis said more roses are grown in the world than two or three other types of flowers combined.

Besides being pleasant to look at and to smell, roses have been used for various purposes throughout history.

Roses reached their height of popularity in the 1700s because people thought the flower was a general cure-all, helping everything from ingrown toenails to pneumonia, he said.

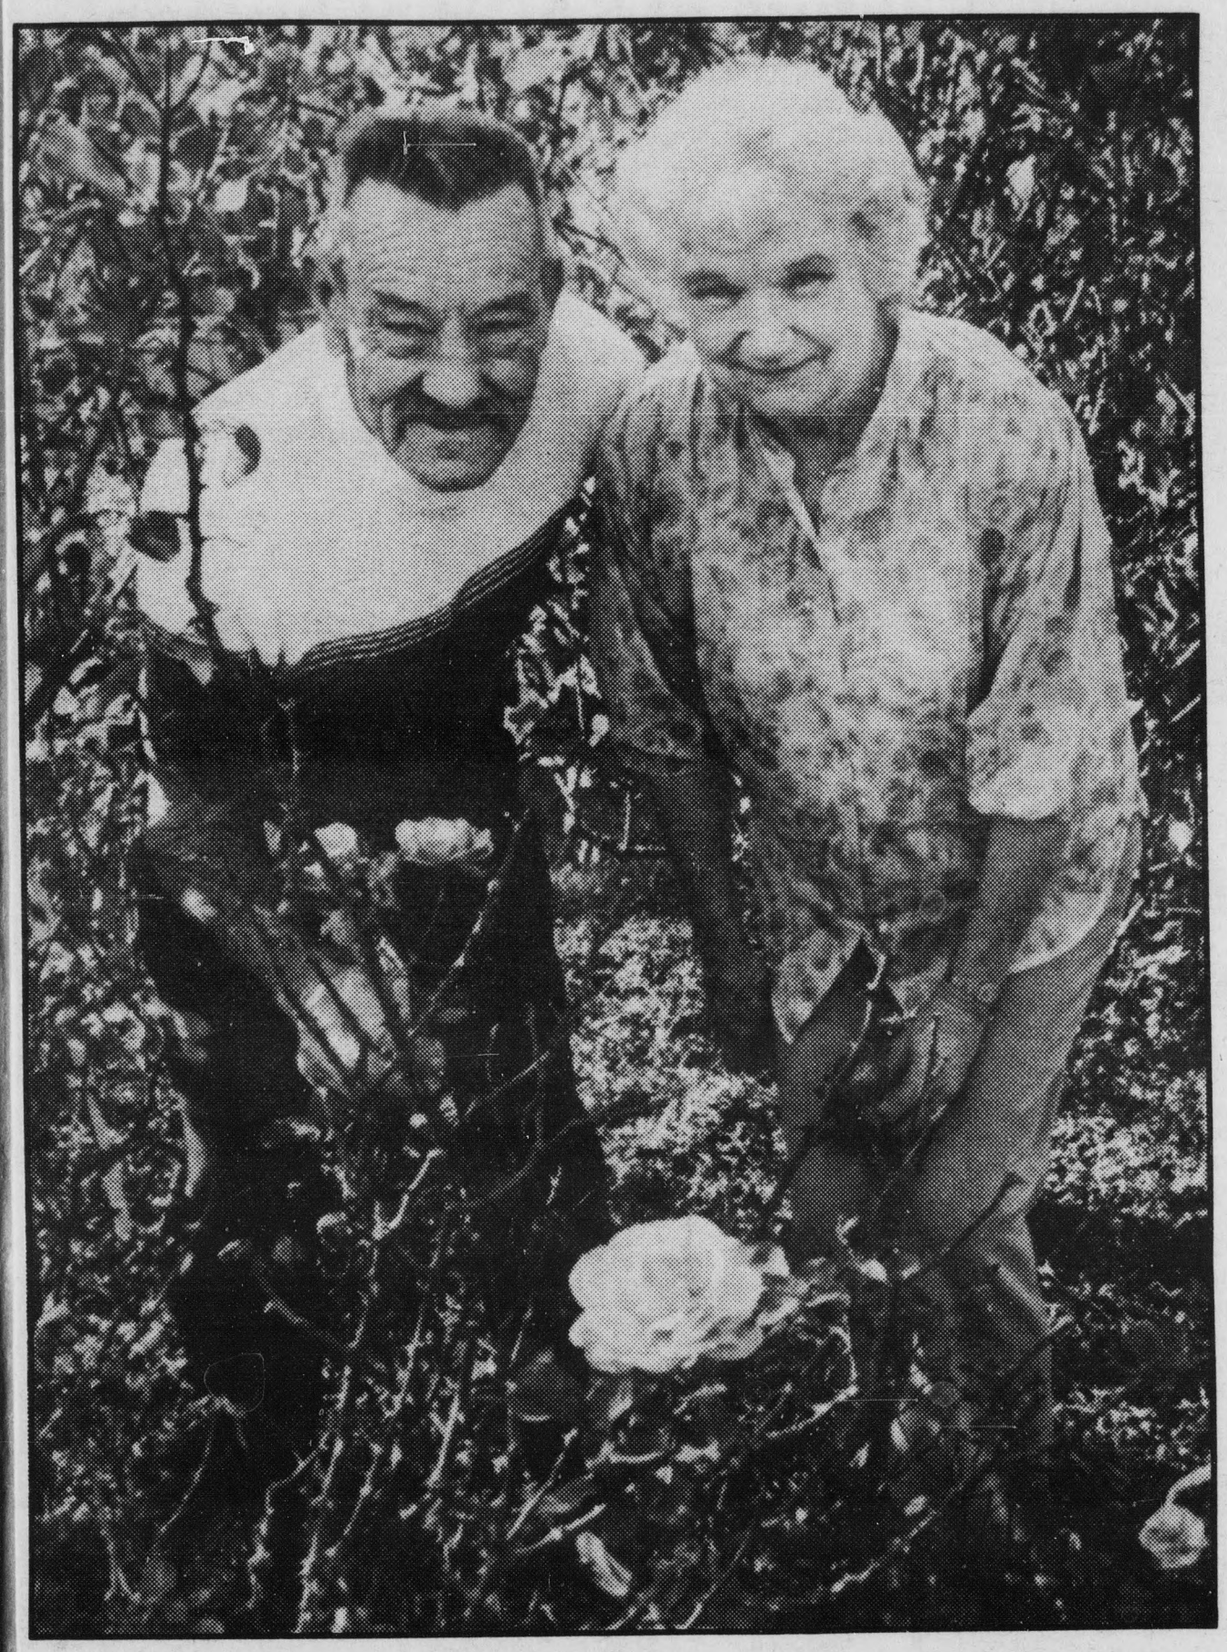

The rose is in the same family as such fruits as apples, plums, berries and apricots. During World War II, the British used rose hip to make vitamin C. Jarvis said rose hip has four times the amount of vitamin C found in citrus fruit.

In addition, roses are used to provide scents for soap and perfume.

"We have had a lot of fun and have made a lot of friends because of our roses and membership in the American Rose Society," Jarvis said.

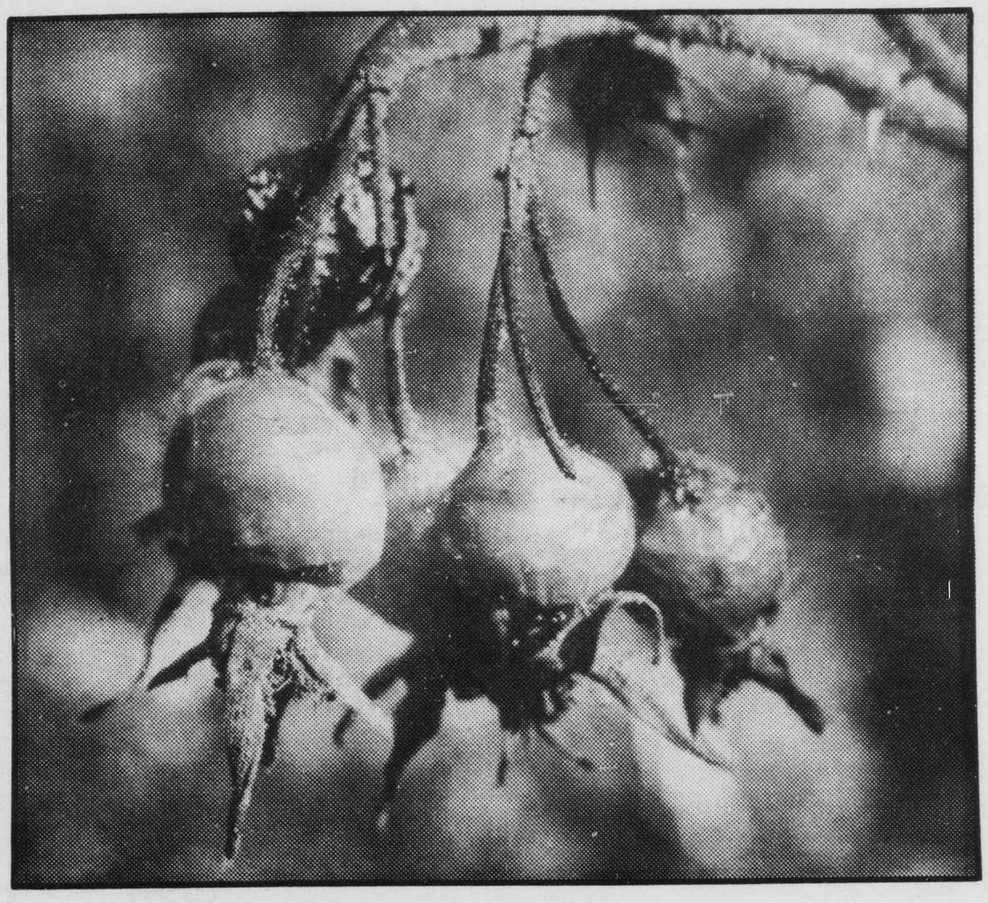

The Jarvises will be showing their prize roses in June at the Inland Valley Rose Show in Montclair.

Jarvis and his wife, Evedna, are members of the American Rose Society and past presidents of the Inland Valley Rose Club of Upland. Jarvis is a past president of the Greater Los Angeles Rose Council and founder-president of the Invitational Rose Seminar. □

Everything is just rosey at Don Jarvis' Upland home. The retired truck driver has more than 700 of his favorite flowers in his yard. Each flower is tagged with a label containing their scientific and common names. This bud (left) technically is known as a florabunda but most rose enthusiasts know it as "Lil Darling." Jarvis and his wife, Evedna, are at home in their garden (top right). Rose hips (right) contain large amounts of vitamin C. Each hip has seeds in it. Each seed takes 10 years to become a rose bush. In addition to its beauty, (bottom right) roses also can be trecherous. This Spinnosissima's thorns are the only visible means of a rose bush now during the flower's dormant stage. On the cover: Three blossoms of "Joseph's Coat".

Tony Brown works part-time at the Uplander Coffee Shop as part of the county's Project Workability school program.

Students learn their trades on job in school project

By Suzanne Sproul

Breaking into the work force without any experience can be difficult, but Tony Brown of Upland is getting a helping hand.

Brown is the first student placed in the San Bernardino County school system's new Project Workability.

The program involves placing special education students in the local job market so they can earn money and gain work experience while still attending school, according to Carol Gentili, West End Special Services region spokeswoman.

As part of the program, 17-year-old Brown works two hours each morning at the Uplander Coffee Shop for 10 weeks. He then attends his regular Upland High School classes during the rest of the day. He is paid and received workman's compensation.

"There is a need to have more students placed in private industry work so they can train for future jobs," Ms. Gentili said.

Brown is the first of 50 students that will participate in the program. Employers hiring students are eligible to receive a targeted tax credit up to $3,000, she said.

"The more students we can get involved in the program the better. The program is a good example of private industry cooperating with public schools," Ms. Gentili said.

Shop owner Rebecca Leung said she knows the difficulties of being young and finding a job without experience.

"I remember trying to find a job when I was Tony's age and no one would me a chance. I wanted to give him a chance," Ms. Leung said. "Even if he doesn't go into restaurant work later on, learning to cook will always be a help to him."

Brown said he's always been interested in cooking and helps out at home. He spent Thursday, his second day on the job, learning the basics of dish-washing and keeping the kitchen clean.

Later in the program the coffee shop's cook, Peter Leung, will give Brown a few pointers on the art of cooking.

After the 10 weeks have been completed, Ms. Leung said, she has the option of hiring Brown if a position is open.

Although interested in cooking, Brown said he wasn't sure what he wanted to do in the future. He does, however, plan to attend Mount San Antonio College after graduation.

Upland commerce rests on foundation of services

By Suzanne Sproul

In a city where industry isn't king, retail businesses and professional services will continue to be the mainstay of the commerce market.

Geography to some extent has dictated what businesses will operate in Upland. City officials, however, by choice have continued to promote only clean, light industry.

"Upland is a service center. Being in the middle of fast-growing Rancho Cucamonga and the Montclair Plaza has helped," said Tony Malone, Upland Chamber of Commerce executive director.

Residents from surrounding communities tap Upland's vast market of physicians, attorneys, accountants and insurance offices, Malone said.

With an absence of large industrial firms, the city's top three employers are San Antonio Community Hospital, the Upland School District and the city.

A great number of people are needed to operate a hospital, particularly when the facility is the largest in the Upland-Ontario-Montclair area, according to Bob Sherwood, hospital board of trustees member.

San Antonio employs full-time and part-time personnel. In addition, it maintains employees who are on call during the day. Overall the hospital employs 1,328 people, according to personnel records.

"The city doesn't have an industrial base and large numbers of people are needed to operate a hospital," Sherwood said. "I don't think Upland will ever have another employer that employs more people than we do."

In order to staff and operate 11 schools, the Upland School District employs 350 full-time personnel. The district is the second major employer in the city.

"Upland just doesn't have any big industrial plants, said George Renworth, district superintendent.

"Education is Upland's most important product."

Mary Ann Reiss, Upland Personnel Director, said she never considered the city as an employer. With 280 permanent employees and about 100 part-time people, the city is the third largest employer in the community.

"I never really thought of the city as being an employer but the fact that Upland has more personnel than other private industries, I guess that would make us a major employer," Ms. Reiss said.

The city has a large number of professional services, particularly physicians, she said.

The city does have a number of professional services. According to chamber records as of September 1984, the city had 134 doctors or a doctor-population ratio of 2.4 per 1,000 people.

Mrs. Carme Naverrette, present owner of the China House, and Mrs. Helen Kilmurry, retired historic preservation commissioner, will share recollections of the early Chinatown.

Children at Los Olivos, Upland's low-cost housing area, watch Danny Martinez clean up their playground. Martinez works for the California Conservation Corps. Members of the Corps have spent weeks doing maintenance work.

California Conservation Corpsmen are providing free maintenance work at Upland's low-cost housing area.

The facility's appearance has improved and the Upland Housing Authority is reaping about $10,000 in savings. Corps members stationed in Pomona have spent the past two weeks working at Los Olivos doing everything from hanging doors to building a storage area. The group also has cleaned up the facility's day care center grounds.

"Considering the total amount of work they have done, the housing director and myself figure the housing authority has saved between $8,000 and $10,000," said Carla van Gaalen, day care center director.

Although the corps is providing free labor, the housing authority is paying for the materials.

Ms. van Gaalen said the housing authority is extremely pleased with the corps' job. The authority plans to ask the group to do more landscaping around the apartments and the playing field later in the year.

"This is the first time the authority has used the corps. We heard about the good job it did at another day care center and we approached it about working at Los Olivos," she said.

The corps consists of young adults, ages 18 to 23 , who contract their services with the state for one year. The members are paid but the state provides housing and food.

"The corps can provide the labor for any non-profit organization that requests it," Erin Healy, Corps supervisor, said Thursday.

Four to nine corpsmen have been working at the Campus Avenue facility daily from 7:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. After completing their day's work, group members attend required classes in Pomona, Ms. Healy said.

All the corpsmen's days, however, haven't been entirely filled with work.

Danny Martinez spent Thursday morning cleaning the children's playground. In between, he got a chance to make some new friends when inquisitive children approached him about why he was wearing a hard hat and goggles. □

1981 a superior year for Cabernets

By Dan Berger
Copley News Service

There was a lot of hype after California wine makers released their 1980 Cabernet Sauvignons, and I admit that I liked quite a few of the wines myself.

However, in general I like the 1981 Cabernets better.

One reason for this, as readers of my column know, is that I am not usually won over by great gobs of chocolaty, fruity, berrylike scents in Cabernet if the wine also lacks the backbone to carry it for a few years.

That is because fine-quality Cabernet is supposed to age for at least a few years, to improve in the bottle. And to my way of thinking a lot of the very appealing 1980 Cabernets were short-term wines without the stuffing to last until they'll be drinkable.

That is, although the 1980 Cabernets are very likable, the high astringency, high alcohol and high tannin levels of many of them indicate to me that they still will be hard when the fruit begins to dissipate.

And although the 1981s tend to be a little hard at present, I suspect they have the natural acidity that will protect them until they smooth out.

Four distinctly different 1981 wines I tasted recently come to mind as prototypes of the vintage:

Caymus ($12.50): Year to year, these Cabernets have a rare combination of fruit and finesse. This one is probably a little richer than some vintages of Caymus, but the finesse is still there. It is superior wine making, but just a few thousand cases were made.

Lakespring ($11): A far leaner style of wine than the Caymus, with an aroma reminiscent of cherries and an herbal, almost piney scent. It will develop beautifully.

Silverado Vineyards ($11): A spicy character adds to the herbality, making it a candidate to lay away for at least five years. Handsome, complex wine.

Dunn Vineyards ($13.50): A chocolaty aroma was appealing, but the taste of the wine went beyond simplicity.

This wine was made by Randall Dunn, who also is wine maker at Caymus. His wine is distinctly different from the Caymus, however, since it comes from grapes grown on Howell Mountain, where a bare 300 acres of grapes are planted; Caymus gets its grapes from the Napa Valley floor east of Rutherford.

It may be only coincidence that I chose four Napa Valley 1981 Cabernets to talk about now, but I easily could have recommended a handful of 1981 Cabernets, from many regions, that are better than the same winery's 1980 Cabernet.

For example, I liked the '81 Cakebread better than the '80, '81 Diamond Creek wines over the '80s, '81 Mondavi over the '80, '81 BV over the '80; the list could go on.

Also, I've had immeasurable pleasure from the following 1981 Cabernets: Kenwood Artist Series, Whitehall Lane, Glen Ellen, Kistler, Stag's Leap, Newton, Alexander Valley Vineyards, Laurel Glen, Burgess.

CHINA DOLLS

Handmade in Rancho

Her fingers glide over domed cheeks and curled ears searching for blemishes on freshly molded porcelain. Finding clumps and seams on the otherwise smooth surface, she uses her pen knife to scrape them to an airy powder.

Kathy Kelley is a Rancho Cucamonga doll maker who endures and occasionally enjoys the tedium of shaping liquid porcelain into childhood figures.

Kelley's dolls are wide-eyed innocents crafted sometime during the past two years. Though not antiques, they look like the playthings of a horse-and-buggy era.

It is the porcelain that carries the deception. Dolls made from this fragile medium abandoned store shelves long before Barbie Dolls and squashy-faced Cabbage Patch Kids caught the fancy of little girls.

While factories rapidly stamp out "Barbies" and "Kids," Kathy Kelley must stoke her kiln and wait for "her babies" to bake slowly — an exceedingly long treatment of 10 hours cooking and 10 hours cooling.

Before Kelley's dolls reach the kiln, however, they must first be formed from creamy porcelain in plaster molds.

Pouring the liquid into split blocks of plaster cut with textured cores, Kelley waits a minute and opens her mold to release a coarse, eyeless head.

When it completely dries she scrapes and buffs the surface, cuts holes for the eyes, and places it in the kiln for the slow bake. The porcelain glows as it heats and eventually turns transparent. Later, as it cools, its surface transforms to a shell-pink gloss.

After Kelley has put the separate head, arms and legs through the fire, she fastens them together with elastic twine.

While it takes her two or three days to make one doll, she does not simply follow the steps and "voila." There is an element over which she has no control. Unbaked porcelain is so fragile and sensitive to the slightest mishandling or change in weather that two of five dolls break before they can be completed, she says.

While demonstrating how she cuts holes for the eyes in a figure awaiting the hardening fire, Kelley accidently chips off a tiny piece underneath the eye. Slowly shaking her head she says, "You see, it just pops out and that doll's gone."

Only slightly irritated by the slip, she says, "After so many dolls break in your hand you get good-natured about it."

Kelley does most of her doll making in the dining room of her Rancho Cucamonga home and is currently resting from the madness of the holidays when she made 10 dolls in one week to meet Christmas orders. "I got about four hours of sleep that entire week," she says. "When you do it that much, your brain turns to jelly."

Following her vacation, Kelley will begin making dolls again in February.

Porcelain dolls are not for everyone. With all the labor put into each doll, the price tag can be hefty. A 30-inch doll (the largest Kelley makes) can cost up to $600, while many smaller figures sell for slightly less than $100.

Kelley learned to work with porcelain from a doll maker in Mira Loma. "I've always liked (porcelain dolls) but I never did have any when I was younger," says Kelley, asked why she learned the craft. "It just fascinates me to see how they're put together and how much they look like real people."

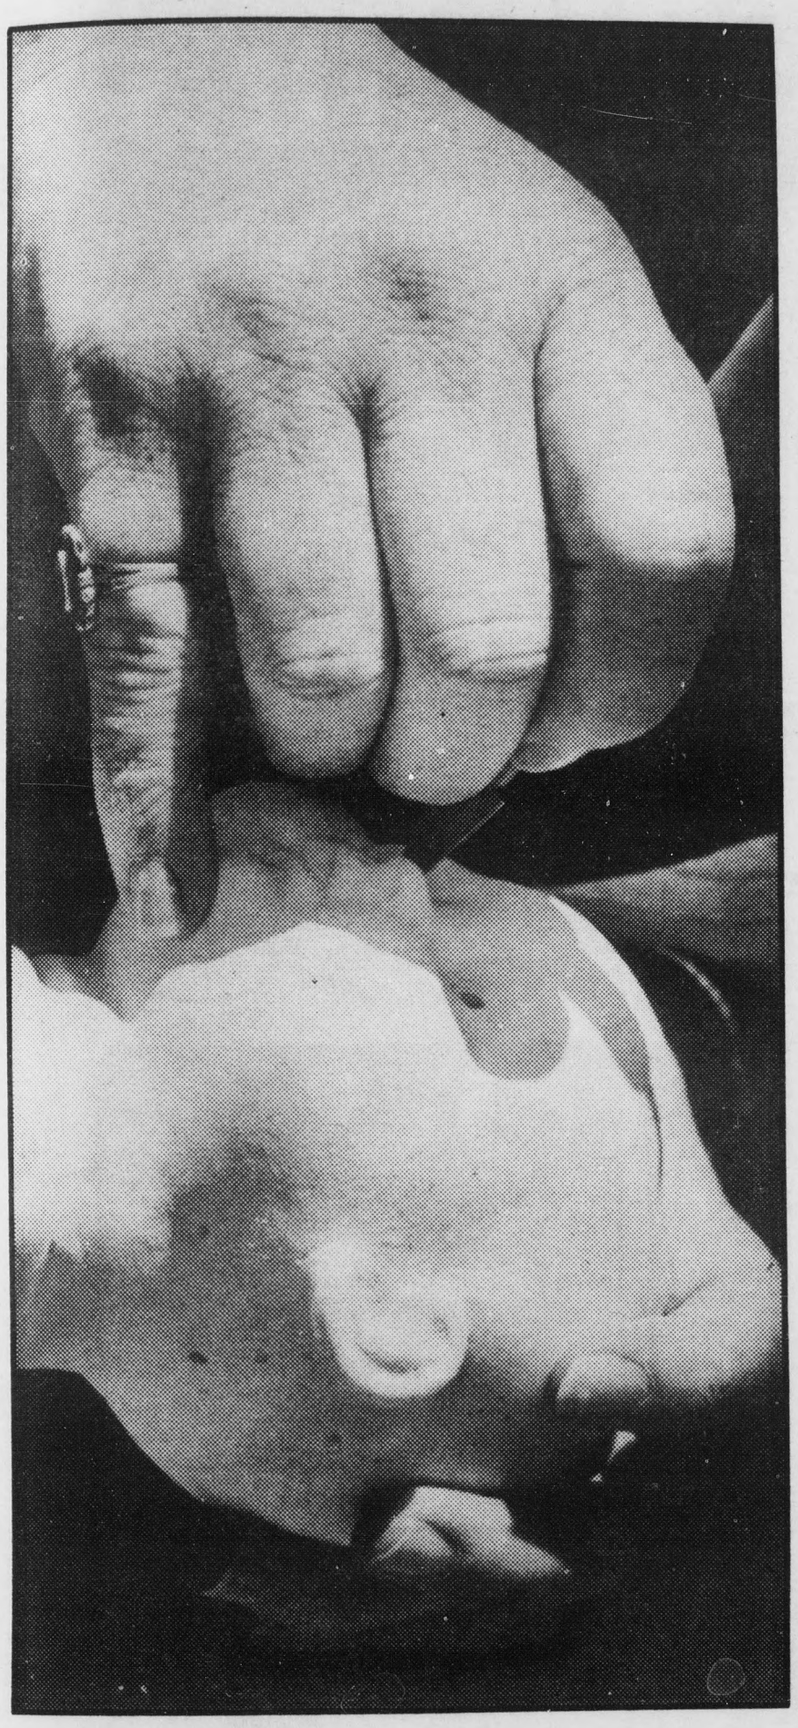

Sliding open the doors of her bedroom closet, she reveals a multi-cultural host of youthful dolls dressed in exotic outfits.

"These are my babies," she croons. "They're ones I made but they wouldn't sell. They have to have a home with someone who loves them so I keep them here."

She gently cradles her closet creations in her hands, supporting their backs and necks as if they were newborns.

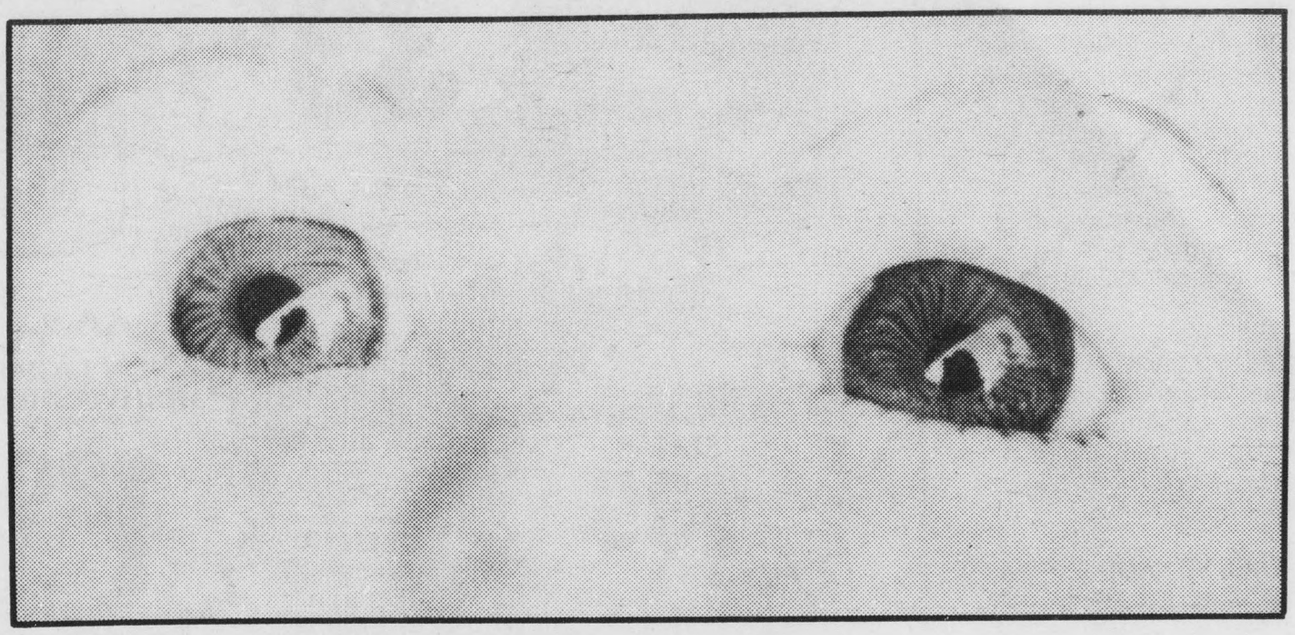

"They're the dolls no one wanted," she says with a kind of sad affection. □

*Rancho Cucamonga resident and dollmaker Kathy Kelley (left) shows one her favorite creations, the result of many long hours of work. In her closet (below) Kelley keeps her "babies," the dolls that no one would buy. Cutting holes for the eyes (center) is a tedious process requiring a steady hand. When the holes are cut, the eyes (top right) are put in place with beeswax and plaster. PETS

Q. When should a mare pass her afterbirth following foaling? Our 13-year-old quarter horse mare did not pass her afterbirth until 12 hours after giving birth to her last foal. The mare did not seem ill in any way. Both she and the foal are doing well now.

Should we have called a veterinarian to examine the mare?

A. Although the fetal membranes, afterbirth or placenta, usually are expelled from the foaling mare within 30 minutes to three hours after parturition, it is fairly common for mares to retain their fetal membranes for eight to 12 hours without any indication of illness. It usually is considered abnormal for mares to retain their fetal membranes longer than 12 hours following foaling.

Following birth, the mare's uterus continues to contract for several hours. During this period the fetal membranes usually separate from the wall of the mare's uterus. Many mares show signs of abdominal pain or colic during this time.

Many mares that retain their placentas do not exhibit such pains. These mares often eat, drink, suckle their foals and generally appear to be very content during this early period following foaling.

Retained placenta usually is easily diagnosed. The afterbirth usually can be seen hanging from the mare's vulva. Generally, a veterinarian should be called to examine any mare that has not passed her placenta within three hours following foaling.

Treatment often involves the use of oxytocin in very carefully calculated doses at very specific times, the use of antibiotics, tetanus antitoxin, antihistamines and steroids. Of course your veterinarian should prescribe the appropriate treatment after carefully examining your mare.

If the placenta is retained longer than 24 hours some veterinarians recommend manual removal of it. This is a job for the veterinarian. Laymen never should try to remove the placenta from a mare. Retained placenta in the mare usually is caused by prior infection of the uterus.

Mares bred on the ninth day of foal heat have retained placentas more often than mares not bred on foal heat. Excessive breedings during one heat or the breeding of infected mares or infected stallions may precipitate retained afterbirths. Anything causing infection of the uterus predisposes mares to retained afterbirth.

Retained placenta in the mare usually is not serious if treated promptly. You should keep your mare in clean foaling quarters and call your veterinarian if the placenta is retained longer than three hours.

COINS

By Gary L. Palmer
Copley News Service

Each year I eagerly await Canada's announcement of what it will commemorate on coins. Our neighbor to the north does far and away the best numismatic job in the world of leaving a legacy for future generations.

Significant events in Canadian history will be easily discerned by future archaeologists digging in the past. For coins do indeed tell much of the history of civilization. And nobody has told its history better than Canada in recent years with the annual issue of commemorative coins chronicling important places and events.

The 1985 Canadian silver dollar and $100 gold coin will mark the centennial of Canada's first national park. The dollar reverse design will feature a moose standing in water with trees and mountains in the background.

The legend on the coin will be in English and French, reading "National Parks 1885-1985 Parcs Nationaux."

On the obverse will be the Arnold Machin portrait of Queen Elizabeth, used until this year on all recent coinage of Britain.

Another animal, a bighorn sheep on a cliff, will be featured on the $100 gold coin that has been so popular with collectors.

The Machin portrait also will be used but the legend will change slightly: "1885 National Parks Parcs Nationaux 1985."

Mintage on the gold coin will be held to 20,000.

The mint chose the national parks theme over the 200th anniversary of the incorporation of St. John's, New Brunswick, the 350th anniversary of the death of explorer Samuel de Champlain, the 100th anniversary of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the telegraph centennial and Canada's 100th anniversary of the electric streetcar.

Several of the themes not chosen, however, are linked to the development of Canada's national park system.

As construction of the Canadian Pacific moved west from Calgary, workers on the rail gangs used their spare time hunting and prospecting in the Canadian Rockies.

In November 1883, just outside of Banff, Alberta, several of the railway employees stumbled on a cavern with a warm pond fed by a natural hot spring. A crude cabin was built at the site and as word spread among workers, scores of cabins and shacks went up.

By late summer 1885 the government's Interior Department decided it was important to preserve the spring from private development and on Nov. 15, 1885, the Canadian Cabinet did so, reserving a 10-square-mile area for future park use.

Less than two years later Banff National Park was established.

Today Canada has a heritage network that encompasses 29 national parks, more than 70 national historic parks and sites and nine heritage hotels.

And future archaeologists, digging in the rubble of the 20th century, will have learned a bit more about Canada's history, thanks to its excellent commemorative coin program.

Bernstein to lecture at Harvey Mudd College

Alvin H. Bernstein, chairman of the department of strategy at the U.S. Naval War College, will be the first Zarem lecturer of 1985 at Harvey Mudd College Feb. 6 at 8 p.m. in Galileo Hall, Claremont.

His topic will be "The Nature of Defensive Imperialism." Admission is free. Area residents are invited.

Bernstein was chairman of the department of Near Eastern studies at Cornell University before going to the war college in 1982. He also has taught at Yale University and the University of Missouri.

The lecture series is made possible through a donation by Abe Zarem, a Los Angeles businessman.

PHOTO TIPS

By Holt Confer
Copley News Service

If you spent last week with this column, you'll remember we defined many of the common terms used in photographic lighting — for example, we differentiated between light intensity and a given amount of light; we talked about candlepower seconds, footcandles, beam candlepower and beam candlepower seconds.

And even though these terms may scare you by being semi-scientific, they really are the basis on which the output of all artificial photographic lighting is based. Even the meters we've talked about so many times use these same definitions (converted to formula and used by the electronic circuitry) to provide accurate incident or reflective light readings.

That's why it's important for you to give those definitions much more than just passing consideration.

Incidentally, I do need to tell you that this lighting information has been taken from some informative literature published by Paul C. Buff Inc. — the Nashville-based company making the White Lightning strobe lights.

But let's get back to our subject and see how f-stops relate to light. An f-stop is the manufacturer's way of defining the ratio of the lens aperture diameter to the lens focal length. For example, a 100mm lens with a lens aperture diameter of 25mm would show that relationship as f4. You know, of course, making that diameter larger increases the amount of light striking the film; while making it smaller reduces the amount of light getting to the film.

Standard aperture numbers are f1, f1.4, f2, f2.8, f4, f5.6, f11, f16, f22, f32, f64 and so on. Those numbers haven't been chosen at random — each step is 1.414 (the square root of 2) times larger or smaller than its neighbor. So each f-stop — going up the scale — halves the amount of light; while each f-stop — going down the scale — doubles the amount of light.

To put this into perspective, if the film plane receives 10 footcandles of light intensity with a setting of f8, it will receive 5 footcandles should you move up to f11, or 20 footcandles if you move down the scale to f5.6, assuming the shutter speed is kept constant.

Photographers almost always will use f-stops to describe not only the lens aperture, but also to indicate the amount of light actually reaching the film. If, for example, a 500-watt photoflood were replaced with a 1,000-watt photoflood, the photographer would describe the change as "an increase of one f-stop." If filtration were required that passed only half the available light, then there would be "a one f-stop loss."

The same rule applies to film. Double the density of the film — such as going from 100 ASA to 200 ASA — and you've gained one f-stop. Drop from 400 ASA to 200 ASA and you've lost one f-stop.

But wait. There is an exception to this rule, and the exception deals with the light to subject distance. Double the light to subject distance and you don't lose one f-stop — instead, you lose 2 f-stops. Here we've come face-to-face once again with that old bugaboo, the Inverse Square Law. Remember — the intensity of light falling on a subject is inversely proportional to the distance between the surface and the light source.

Data Design sells Minnesota plant

Data Design Laboratories of Rancho Cucamonga recently announced the sales of the assets of its small Aeroscientific printed wiring board facility in Minnesota.

Specific terms of the cash transaction were not disclosed, but the company indicated it would realize a small gain on the sale.

Thomas C. Beisecker, Data Design chairman, said the small plant did not fit the company's expansion plans because it could not be expanded and was not large enough to convert to automation.

Grossi ready for drag opener

Upland's Frank Grossi will try and guide his Camaro to another NHRA Sportsman's victory.

The National Hot Rod Association's traditional season-opening event, the Chief Auto Parts Winternationals, celebrates its 25th anniversary with a record purse and more than 500 competitors beginning next Thursday.

The first NHRA/Winston World Championship Series drag race in 1985 carries a cash and contingencies purse of $787,750.

Qualifying is scheduled Thursday through Saturday, from 8 a.m.-5:30 p.m. Top Fuel, Funny Car and Pro Stock sessions take place Thrusday at 1 p.m. Friday and Saturday at 11 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. at the track, which is located on the Los Angeles County Fairgrounds. Eliminations begin Sunday at 11 a.m.

Among the competitors will be Upland's Frank Grossi. Two years ago he won the Winston World Finals in Super Stock competition and will be trying to nab his first Winternationals title.

This event marks the return to fill-time NHRA competition of Top Fuel dragster driver Don Garlits. He won the last two 1984 races — the U.S. Nationals and Winston World Finals — and has 23 career victories, most among Top Fuel drivers.

Garlits, 53, scored his first NHRA triumph 22 years ago at the third annual Winternationals when his Dodge-powered dragster ran the quarter-mile in 8.26 seconds at 186.32 miles per hour. By comparison, at the World Finals last October, also held in Pomona, Garlits recorded his quickest-ever elapsed time, 5.46 seconds, and fastest speed, 263.92 mph.

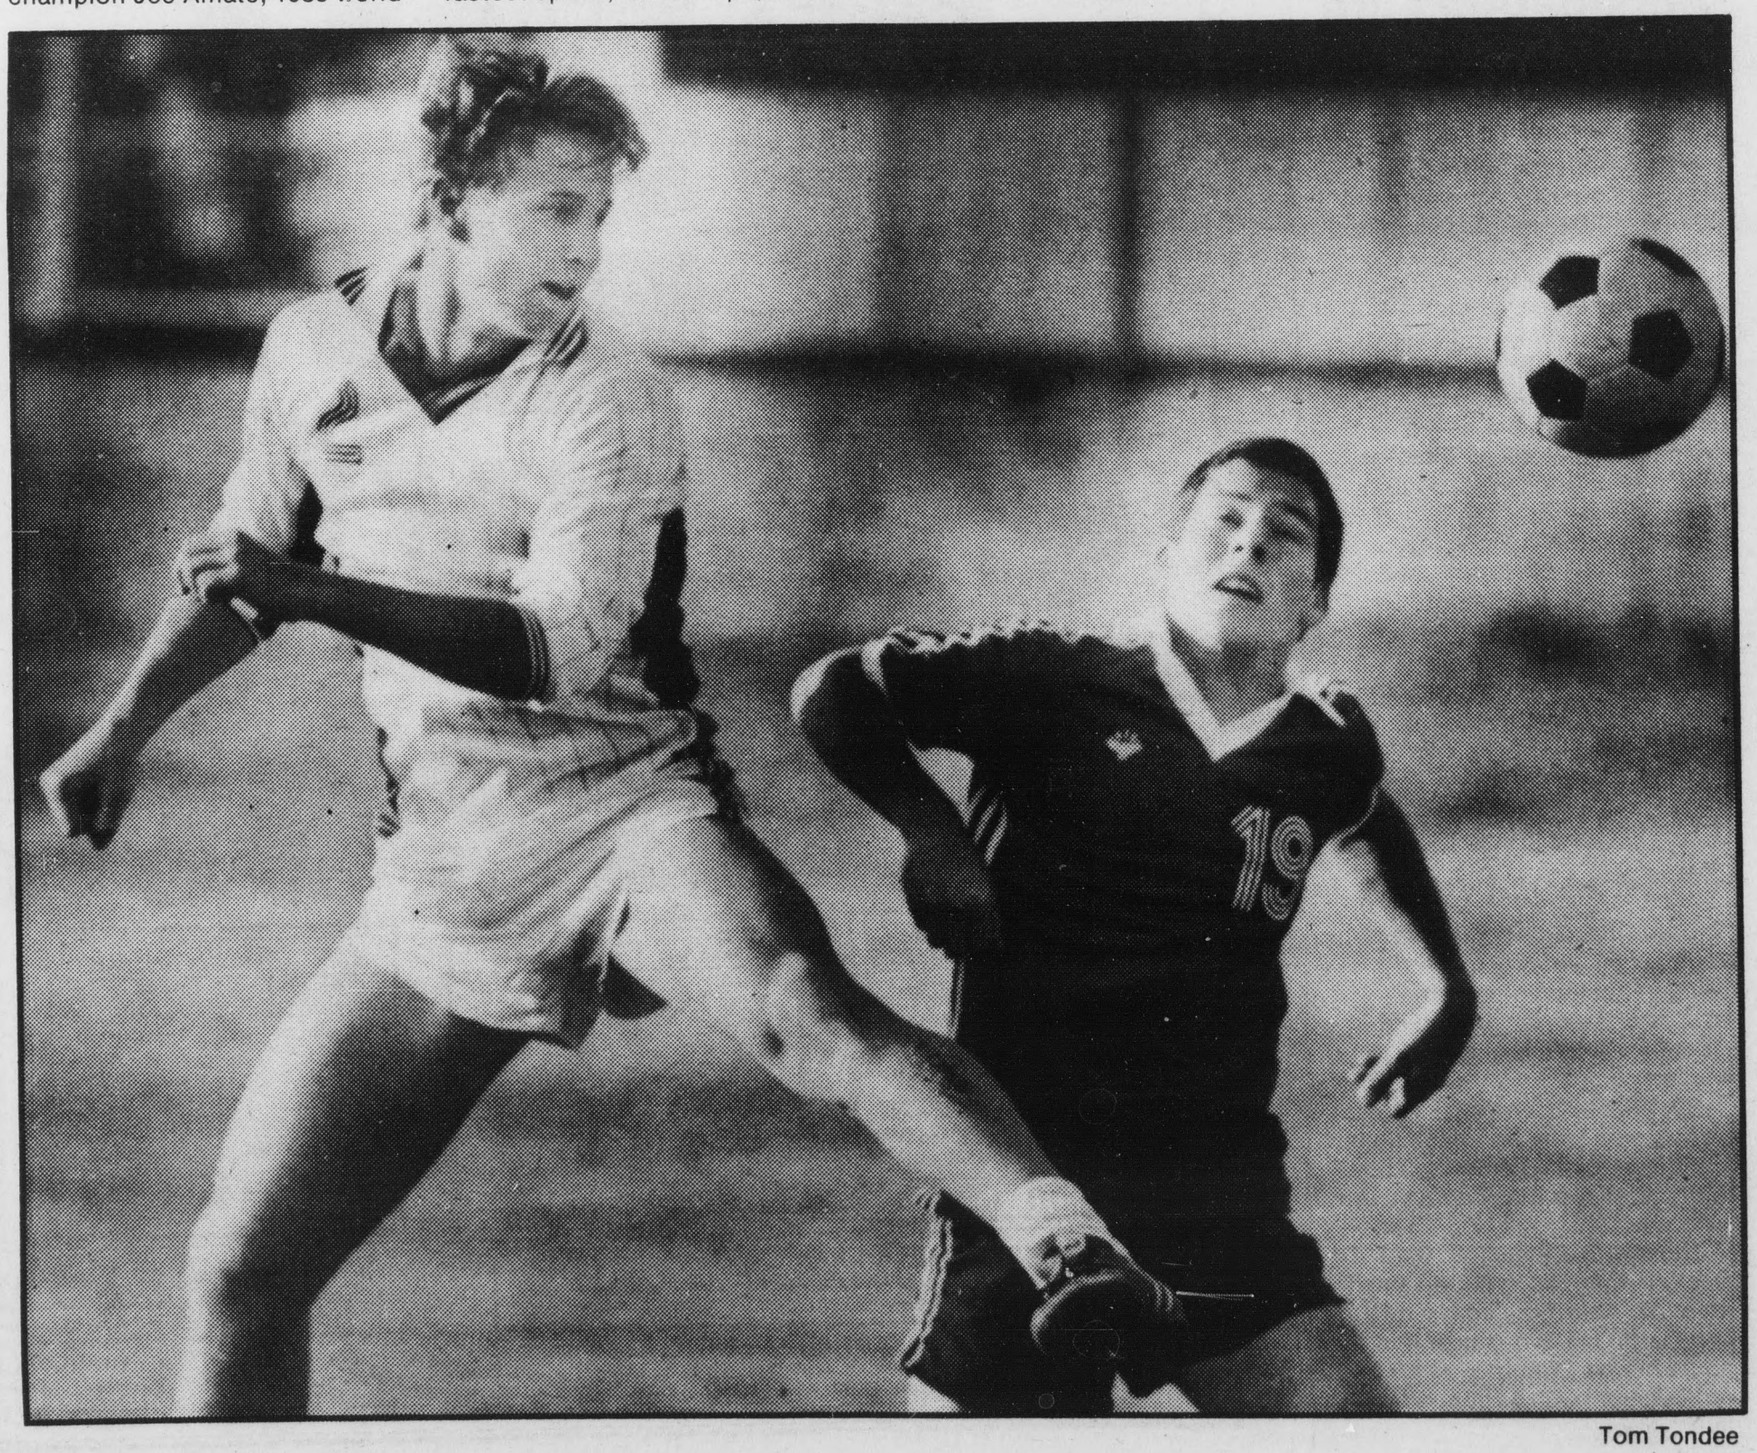

Contending with Garlits for Silver Anniversary Top Fuel honors will be defending world champion Joe Amato, 1983 world champion Gary Beck, defending Winternationals winner Gary Ormsby, Larry Minor, Gene Snow and Connie Kalitta.

In his last Pomona appearance in October, reigning Winston Funny Car world champion Mark Oswald posted the category's fastest speed, 261.62 mph, en route to a runner-up finish in the World Finals. He ranks as one of the favorites again this time.

Sharing the favorite's role in the highly-competitive Funny Car field are Billy Meyer, runner-up to Oswald in the title chase last season, Kenny Bernstein, Don Prudhomme, Ed McCulloch, Jody Smart and John Force.

In the Pro Stock ranks, the triumverate of four-time reigning world champion Lee Shepherd, former five-time champion Bob Glidden and Warren Johnson will again be the drivers to watch.

Scoring an upset

Upland High School's Mike Szarzyniski (right) is denied the ball by Scott Hurst of Alta Loma in last Friday's Baseline League tussle. The Scots posted a 3-2 victory and scrambling the league standings as a result. Upland will host Glendora Friday evening at 6 at Highlander Stadium, while the girls play on the road at 3:15 p.m.
